of appearance, the program is simple and intuitive, oriented towards a wide array of audiences due to its intuitive approach. The only discomfort is that you cannot specify a range, but you have to paste the all the IPs manually. Once you press the 'Start' button, the program proceeds to analyzing the address and to list details such as host name, roundtrip time and buffer size for the IPs that are allocated. If an address is not available, the search process takes forever, sometimes causing the application to become unresponsive. Overall, My LAN Network Scaner seems like a good initiative, but needs to be refined in terms of functionality and appearance in order to appeal to the crowds.(Note: BTW, one other thing I'd love to see: Nespresso exponents an actual device that looks like a Nespresso. It could include an auto-timer like the Nespresso S/S etc. that you could set the timer on the auto-timer and a USB port so that you can charge another device. (Not a jam or coffee maker like it has now, but one that you could charge your phone or other tiny device. That would be cool). 09e8f5149f

In terms of appearance, the program is simple and intuitive, oriented towards a wide array of audiences due to its intuitive approach. My LAN Network Scaner comes with a few built-in settings, which is not a bad thing, especially that they can be customized to some extent. By default, it is set to scan an IP range that starts from 192.168.1.1 to 198.168.1.255, which is a typical IP set for Linksys routers. However, you can define a custom list of IP addresses to be scanned using the Options section. The only discomfort is that you cannot specify a range, but you have to paste the all the IPs manually. Once you press the 'Start' button, the program proceeds to analyzing the address and to list details such as host name, roundtrip time and buffer size for the IPs that are allocated.
